The Government is not at present accepting the nomination, either in New Zealand or England, of men between eighteen and forty years of age, as it is deemed inadvisable to continue any course of action that might interfere in any degree with the requirements of the military authorities in England.

Steps are being taken to ascertain the number of women in the United Kingdom under forty-five years of age who have lost their breadwinners through the war, and who may be willing to emigrate to New Zealand under the existing scheme of assisted passages to take up domestic service in the Dominion.

The experiment of introducing boys with some farming experience at Home for farm-work in New Zealand has proved successful, and the results justify further trials on a larger scale. Hundreds of applications have been received by the Department from small farmers who require this class of labour, and as soon as it is possible to resume a more active immigration policy special attention will be given to the immigration of farm boys.

The question of offering special facilities to Belgian women to come to New Zealand as domestic servants has been under consideration, and the High Commissioner is now making inquiries with a view to ascertaining how far the proposals of the Government are likely to prove acceptable. It is not the desire of the Department to take advantage of the distress of the Belgian people to promote its own special schemes of immigration, but rather to offer such opportunities to the Belgian women as they may desire to take advantage of. In the case of such immigrants the Government propose to pay the whole passage-money to New Zealand.
