Tennysons' Last Doems:

N the numerous appreciations of Tanayson that have appeared during the last month or so, nothing in the work of the late Laureate has been so much remarked as the variety of its contents—a variety specially notable in the case of so finished an artist. The small volume which has just been issued, seems to present in little a curiously faithful image of the whole work of which it is the epilogue as well as the epitome. 'The Death of 'Enone' is one of those classic monologues (a form originally invented by Landor in the 'Hellenics') of which the exquisite '(Enone of 1832 is perhaps the most famous, as it is certainly one of the most beautiful. 'St. Telemachus' and 'Akbar's Drean' night be compared, after a fashion, with such pieces as 'St Sineon Seylites' and 'Lucretius,' in which the monologue and short narrative poem deal with graver thences of religion and philosophy. 'The Bandit's Death' and 'Charity,' in their different ways, belong to the series of little hallad tragecies of which 'Rizpah' is the sapreme example. 'The Churchwarden and the Curate' is a dialect poem after the manner of 'The Northern Farmer.' The Dawn' and 'The Making of Man' have something in common with' both the temper and the form of some of the fiercer parts of 'Mand' and the more prophetic parts of 'Locksley Hall.' A voice spake ont of the skies' recalls the earlier lift, 'Flower in the crannied wall;' there is a dedication to the Master of Balliol, which reminds one of the lines to the Rev. F. D. Manrice; there is, finally, one of the official pieces in a brief lament on the death of the Duke of Clarence. Such variety in the work of a poet past eighty is itself enough to give extraordinary interest to a volume holding such 'infinite riches in a little room.' That any of the work published now can seriously compete with the earlier verse which it recalia is not to be expected. Much of it gives the effect of a careful tracing rather than of an original design. But the pattern chosen is dedicated to the Master of Balliol in some graceful s

Dear Master in our classic town, You, loved by all the younger gown There at Halliol, Lay your Plato for one minute down,

And read a Grecian tale re-told, Which cast in later Grecian mould, Quintus Calaber Somewhat lazily handled of old;

And on this white midwinter day — For have the far-off hymus of May, All her melodies, All her harmonies echo'd away ?—

To-day, before you turn again To thoughts that lift the soul of men, Hear my cataract's Downward thunder in hollow and glen,

Till, led by dream and vague desire.
The woman, gliding toward the pyre,
Find her warrior
Stark and dark in his funeral fire.

The story of Enone's death follows, in the main, the version's somewhat lazily handled' by Quintus Smyrmens in the tenth book of his tiresome epic. To thome, dreaming of the Paris once 'beauteous as a god,' comes Paris, 'lame, crooked, reeling, livid,' and prays her to heal the poisoned wound of which he is dying. She bids him die; be goes from her, a shadow sinking into the mist; and out of the vague terror of a dream she wakens beneath the stars.

the vague terror of a dream she wakens beneath What star could burn so low I not Hion yet. What light was there? She rose and slowly down. By the long torrent's ever deepend roor. She waked a bird of prey that scream'd and pase'd; She roused a snake that hissing withed away; A panther sprang across her path, she heard The shrick of some lost life among the pines. But when she gain'd the border vate, and saw The ring of faces reddened by the finines. But when she gain'd the border vate, and saw The ring of faces reddened by the finines of the long that had lated to do did in hera there body which had late as a long to the long that ask'd Falteringly. Who lies on younder pyre? But every man was mute for reverence. Then moving quickly forward till the beat Smote on her brow, she lifted up a voice Of shrill command, 'Who burns upon the pyre? Whereon their oldest and their boldest said, 'He, whom thou wouldst not heal!' and all at once The morning light of happy marriage broke Thro's all the clouded years of widowhood, And mutiling up her comely head and crying 'Husband' she leept upon the funeral pile. And mixed herself with him and past in fire. St. Telemachus' we have the story of the her

In 'St. Telemachus' we have the story of the hermit through whose death—a voluntary martyrdom—the gladiatorial fights were put an end to at Rome. The story is told briefly, pointedly, with admirable art, yet, after all, coldly, without a thrill. It has heautiful passages—thie, for instance, telling of the anchorite in his desert, and of the call to Rome:—

to Rome:

And once a flight of shadowy fighters crost. The disk, and once, he thought, a shape with wings Camo aweeping by him, and pointed to the Wost, And at his ear he heard a whisper' Rome And in his heart he cried, 'The call of (tod'! And call'd arose, and slowly plunging down Thro that disastrous glory, set his face By waste and itsiastrous glory, set his face By waste and teld and town of slien tongue, by waste and sled and town of slien tongue, of weeking stars,' and every dawn Struck from him his own shadow on to Rome.

Struck from him his own shadow on to Rome.

The decorative qualities of the poem have much of the old heauty: but it lacks humanity, the touch of nature. 'Akbar's Dream' is a monologue spoken by the great Mogul Emperor, 'whose tolerance of religion and abhorrence of religious persecution put our Tudors to shame'—to quote from the eight pages of notes which accompany the fourteen pages of verse. The poem is somewhat after the model of Browning; but it has not that mastery of material, that skill in grouping, which we find in all Browning's monologues. It is not really interesting, and it requires the eight pages of notes. Does any really successful poem require notes? The style, too, is somewhat rugged and uneven; as in this curious passage, for instance:—

Should shrick its claim 1 inny am in heaven. The cape him to the Grack Why that were such in 1 inny am in heaven. Why that were such in the first in the Grack Had hardly dreament of. The first in all, and light with more or less of shall, and light with more or less of shall. Main-modes of worship; but our litums, who 'sitting on green sofas contemplate. The torment of the damn'd 'already, these Are like wild brutes new caged - the narrower The cage, the more their fury.

In 'The Bandit's Death' and 'Charity' we get some of the human feeling which we have noted as lacking in 'St. Telemachus.' Both are written in the metre of 'Rizpah,' that fine flexible loog line which Tennyson has fashioned to auch wonderfully expressive uses. 'The Bandit's Wife' is a version of a story told by Scott in his last journal, and it is dedicated to Scott in four rather had lines, historically interesting, no doubt, as a record of literary sympathy. 'Charity' is a striking episode of modern life. A woman tells to a man, who is offering her dresses and laces and jewela, and never a ring for the bride,' the story of her love for another, how he deceived her, how he married an heirese, and how after his death in a railway collision the widow came to her:--

She watch'd me, she nursed me, she fed me, she sat day and night by my bed, Till the joyless birthdey came of a boy born happily dead.

And her name? what was it? I ask'd her. She said with a sudden glow. On her patient face 'My dear, I will tell you before I go.'

And I, when I learnt it at last, I shrick'd. I sprang from my seat, I wept, and I kies'd her hands, I flung myself down at her feet.

And we pray'd together for him, for him who had given her the

She has left me enough to live on. I need no wages of shame. She died of a fever caught when a nurse in a hospital ward. She is high in the Heaven of Heavens, she is face to face with her Lord.

And he sees not her like anywhere in this pittless world of ours! I have told you my tale. Get you gone. I am dressing her grave with flowers.

with flowers.

In 'Kapiolani,' and the pieces which immediately follow it, we find ourselves in quite another atmosphere. 'Kapiolani' (the name of a chieftainess who won the cause of Christianity in the Sandwich Islands 'by openly defying the priests of the terrible goddess Peele') is a curious netrical study—extremely long and extremely short dacty-lic lines, rhymeless except for the somewhat bazardous rhyme of 'Hawa-i-ee.' Hazardous also is the third line in the opening stanza of a very fervent piece called 'The Dawn':

Red of the Dawn!

Sereams of a babe in the red-hot palms of a Moloch of Tyre.

Man with his brotheriess dinner on man in the tropical wood.

Priests in the name of the Lord passing scale ther first to the fire,

Head-hunters and boats of Dahomey that float upon human blood!

blood!

These experiments on rhyme, or rhythm, and on the discretions of poetical style are somewhat frequent in Lord Tennyson's new volume. They do not seem to us to be uniformly successful, and there are, occasionally, lines which are very hard to scan. No fewer than three poems, it is curious to note, are written in the form of Omar Khayyam's quatrain, but in long lines. It is only occasionally that we get a really simple metre; but, as it happens, one of the most charming and original poems in the volume, the hamting little lyric 'The Wanderer,' is written in the simplest of all measures:—

The gleam of household sunshine ends, And here no longer can I rest; Farewell!—You will not speak, my friends, Unfriendly of your parted guest.

O well for him that finds a friend, Or makes a friend where er he come, And loves the world from end to end, And wanders on from home to home!

O happy be, and fit to live, the whom a happy home has power To make him trust his life, and give His fealty to the haleyon hour!

I count you kind, I hold you true;
But what may follow, who can tell?
Give me a hand and you—and you—
And deem me grateful, and farowell!

So confidently, with such happy assurance, could Tenny-son speak of life. How confidently he looked forward to death, let this poem—which might well be the epilogue of a life—assure us:—

Will my tiny spark of being wholly vanish in your deeps and height at Must my day be dark by reason. O ye Heavens, of your boundless nights, Rush of Sinus, and roll of systems, and your flery clash of meteorites?

'Spirit, nearing you dark portal at the limit of thy human state, Fear not thou the indeed, purpose of that power which alone wereat. Nor the my riad world, this shadow, nor the sitent opener of the data.

The volume contains nothing in this kind quite so striking as the 'Crossing the Bar' requient; but it includes the beautiful 'Silent Voices,' which is likely to be Voices, which is almost as popular.

'The Death of (Emone, Akbar's Dream, and Other Poems, By Affred Lord Tennyson, (London Macmillan and Co. 1882)

CARRYING OUT THE WILL.

I HEAR that rich uncle of yours is

'I HEAR that rien under or yours is dead and buried, Terence?'
'He is, Miles.'
'And what sort of a will was that he made? The idea of leaving instructions to have £7,000 buried with him! And you were the executor?'

buried with nim: And you were the executor?

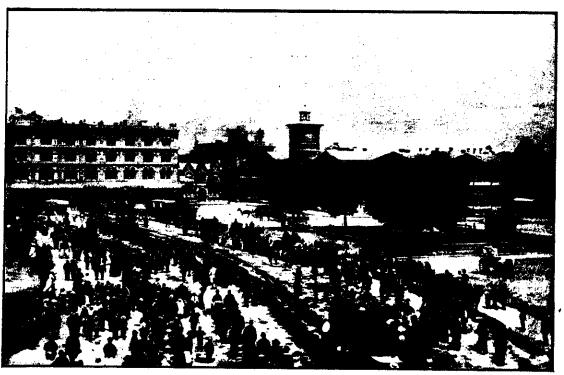

'Faith, that I was.'
'And did you follow out the pro-visions of the will?
'I did that.'
'Ard was it gold you put in the coffin ?'

'It was not.'
'Silver!'
'Devil a haporth.'

Paper money !'
Not a whit,'
And what then !

Sum I signed a cheque payable for the amount, and stock at in his fist when they closed the lid."

CHRISTCHURCH EN FETE. (Cathedral Square on a holiday.)

photo. Christchurch