and suspended as he had released it, then slowly falling. A moment's silence; the glow faded from the sky, and the glow faded from the sky, and from her face, two; then suddenly the blue eyes glimmered with purest mal-

"Having neglected to bring your ladder this line, monsieur, pray accept the use of mine." And she pointed to a rustic ladder lying half-buried in the weedy tangle behind him.

weedy tangle belond him.

He gave himself a moment to steady his voice: "I suppose there was a ladder here—somewhere," he said quietly.
"Oh! And why do you suppose—"
She spoke too hurriedly, and she began again, pleasantly indifferent: "The foresters use a ladder for pruning, not for climbing walls, monsieur."

He strolled over to the thicket, lifted he light ladder, and set it against the all. When he had done this he stepped buck, examining the effect attentive-ly; then, as though not satisfied, shifted ly; then, as though not satisfied, shifted it a trifle, surveyed the result, moved it again, dissatisfied.

"tet me see," he mused aloud, "I want to place it exactly where it was that night—" He looked back at her interrogatively. "Was it about where I have placed it?"

Her face was inscrutable.

Her face was inscrutable.

"Or," he was instruction.
"Or," he continued thoughfully, "was it an inch or two this way? I could tell exactly if the moon were up. Still"—he considered the ladder attentively—"I might be able to fix it with some accuracy if you would help me. Will You?"

"I do not understand," she said. "I do not undersumer, see some "Oh, it is nothing—still, if you wouldn't mind aiding me to settle a matter that interests me—would you?"

matter that interests interest in a manufacture. "With pleasure, monsieur," she said indifferently. "What shall I do?" So he mounted the ladder, crossed the wall, and stood on a stone niche on his side, looking down at the ladder. "Now," he said, "if you would be so aminble, madanne, as to stand on the ladder for one noment you could aid me innicusely,"

"Mount that ladder, monsieur?"

She caught his eyes fixed on her; for just an instant she hesitated, then met them steadily enough; indeed, a growing and innocent curiosity widened her gaze, and she smited and lifted her pretabilities in the steady and she smited and lifted her pretabilities in the steady and her should be seen to be seen as the same her than the steady and her should be seen to be seen as the same her seen as the same seen a ty shoulders—just a trifle, and her skirts just a trifle, too; and, with a grace that made him temble, she mounted the ladder, step by step, until her head and shoulders were on a level with his own across the wall.

"And now?" she asked, raising her eychrons. She asken, raising her eychrons. "The moon," he said unsteadily, "ought to be about—there!" "Where?"

She turned her eyes impairingly skyward.

But his heart had him by the throat

But his heart had him by the throat again, and he was past all speech.

"Well, monstear?" She waited in aweetest patience. Presently: "Have you finished your astronomical calculations? And may I descend?" He tried to speak, but was so long about it that she said very kindly: "You are trying to locate the moon, are you not?"

"No, madame—only a shadow."
"A shadow, mousieur?"—laughing.
"A shadow—a silhouette."

"Of what?"

RE

T

T

T

U

R

E

"Of a-a woman's head against the

"Monsieur, for a realist you are as-tonishingly romantic. Oh, you see I was right! You do belong in a bock."
"You, also," he said, scarcely recog-nizing his own voice. "Men—in books— do well to risk all for one word, one glance from you; men—in books—do glance from you; men-in books-do well to die for you, who reign without

"Monsieur," she faltered.

But he lind found his voice—or one something like it—and he said: "You are right to reduke me; romane; is the shadow, life the substance; and you live, and as long as you live living men must love you; as I love you, Countess of Semois."

"Oh," she breathed tremulously, "oh, you—you think that? You think I am the Countess of Semois? And that is

For a moment her wide eyes hardened, then flashed brilliant with tears.

"Is that your romance, monsieur?—
the romance of a Countess is your dethe romance of a Countess Is your de-elevation for mistress or servants—for the Countess or for her secretary—who sometimes makes her gowns, too? Ah, the sorry romance! Your declaration de-served an audience more fitting—"
"My declaration was made a week ago! The moon and you were audience enough. I love you."
"Mensfear, 1—1 beg you to release my hand—"

my hand-"
"No; you must listen-for the veil of No; you must research face to face romance is rent and we are face to face in the living world! Do you think a real in the living world! Do you wear, if you what title you wear, if you man cares what title you wear, if you but wear his name? Countess that you man cares what title you wear, if you but wear his name? Countess that you are not, woman that you are, is there anything in Heaven or earth that cau make love more than love? Veil your beautiful true eyes with romance, and answer me; look with clear, untroubled cyes upon throbbing, pulsating life; and answer me! Love is no more, no less, than love. I ask for yours; I gave you mire a week ago—in our first kiss."

than love. I ask for young; I gave you mine a week ago—in our first kiss." Her face was white as a flower; the level beauty of her eyes set him trembling.

"Give me one chance," he breathed. "I am not mad enough to hope that the lightning struck us both at a single flash. Give me, in your charity, a chance—a little aid where I stand stun-chance—a little and where I stand attor-ned delinded, alone—you who are still see clearly!"

She did not stir or speak or cease to watch him from unwavering eyes; he leaned forward, drawing her inert hands together between his own; but she freed them, shivering.
"Will you not say one word to me?"

he faltered.
"Three, monsieur." Her eyes closed, she covered them with her slender hands: "I--love—you."

"1--love—you."

Before the moon appeared she had taken leave of him, her hot, young face pressed to his, striving to say something for which she found no words. In tramulous silence she furned in his arms, unclasping his hands and yeilding her own in fragrant adicu.

"Do you not know, oh, most wonderful of lovers—do you not know?" her eyes were saying, but her tips were motionless; she waited, reluctant, trembling. No, he could not understand—he did not care, and the knowledge of it suffused soul with a radiance that trans-

So she left him, the promise of the moon silvering the trees. And he stood there on the wall, watching the lights break out in the windows of her house— stood there while his soul drifted above the world of monalit shadow floating his feet.

Smith!"

"Smith:

Half roused be turned and looked down. The mounlight glimmered on Kingsbury's single eyeglass. After a moment his senses returned; he descended to the ground and peered at Kingsbury, rubbing his eyes.

With one accord they started toward the house, moving slowly, shoulder

the house, moving slowly, shoulder to shoulder.

"Not that I personally eare," brgan Kingsbury. "I am sorry only on ac-count of my country. I was, perhaps, precipitate; but I purchased one hund-red and seven dolls of Mademoiselle Plessis—her private secretary-"What!"

"What!"
"With whom," continued Kingsbury thoughtfully, "I am agreeably in love. Such matters, Smith, cannot be wholly controlled by a sense of duty to one's country. Beauty and rank seldom coincide except in fiction. It appears"—he removed his single eyeglass, polished it with his handkerchief, replaced it, and examined the moon—"It appears," accordinged blandly. 'that it is the Connection of the continued continued the moon—"It appears," according blandly. 'that it is the Connection of the continued blandly. 'that it is the Connection of the continued blandly. 'that it is the Connection of the continued blandly. 'that it is the Connection of the continued blandly.' with his handkerchief, replaced it, and examined the moon—"It appears," no continued blandly, "that it is the Counters of Semois who is—ch—so to speak, afflicted with red hair. . The moon—ahem—is prefernaturally bright this evening, Smith."

After a moment Smith halted and turned, raising his steady eyes to that pale mirror of living fire above the for-

"Well," began Kingsbury irritably, can't you say something!"

"Nothing more than I have said to her already—though she were Empress of the World!" murmured Smitn, staring fixedly at the moon.
"Empress of what? I do not follow you."

"No," said Smith dreamily, "you must not try to. It is a long journey to the summer moon—a long, long journey. I started when I was a child; I reached started when I was a child; I reached it a week ago; I returned to night. And do you know what I discovered there? Why, man, I discovered the veil of Isis, and I looked behind it. And what do you suppose I found? A child, Kingsbury, a winged child, who laughingly handed me the keys of Eden! What do you think of that?"

But Smith had taken too many liberes with the English language, and Kingsbury was far too mad to speak.

BETTER AND BRIGHTER

MARGARET BAVEN OF SYDNEY WRITES A LETTER TELLING HOW JOY OVER-CAME HER DESPAIR.

"There is no joy like the joy of being again in perfect health after you have been disabled, so to speak, by the pains and after-effects of a long, tedious illness." This is the spirit of a letter written on December 7th, 1904, by Miss Margaret Raven, of 127, Quny-street, Ultimo, Sydney, in which she most gra-phically describes her pains, and the wearying effects of the disease—indigestion-that tortured her for fears.

In her letter she says: "I don't think anyone in the world has suffered more anyone in the world has suffered more cruelly from indigestion than I have. For years it blotted all happiness out of my life, and brought me almost to the grave. It made me week, thin, pale, and nerveless, unable to eat, sleep, work or enjoy any of the pleasures of society. I was then residing at Hyde Park, Adelaide, South Australia, of which city I am a native. My case baffied all the skill and knowledge of my doctors. In the end I could not retain food on my stomach, and the mere sight of food other end I could not retain 1000 on my stomach, and the mere sight of food often made me retch and vomit till I was exhausted. The straining from this cause frequently brought on a bleeding from the lungs which alarmed me lest it might be consumption. About two years back, on the faith of advice from a near friend, I began to take Mother Seigel's friend, I began to Syrup.

To my great joy Mother Seigel's Syrup proved to be quite as good as my friend had represented it to be. From the lirst it enabled me to relain my food, and within a couple of weeks I regained my lost appetite. Day by day there was a marked improvement in my there was a marked improvement is my health and appearance. "I felt like a better and brighter be-ing. Instead of moping about the house, dejected and listless. I was soon able to take active interest in the affairs of life, After a few months of perseverance with the medicine my health was thoroughly re-established, and I still remain quite well and happy."

weii and happy."

The strongest testimony in Misa Raven's case is contained in the seven words at the close of her letter, "I still remain quite well and happy!"

GOLD MEDALLIST.

BY APPOINTMENT TO HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR

Art Photographer

Queen Street, Auckland.

SOMETHING NEW!! The Portfolio Sketch Pictures.

Enlargement from any Photo. Artistically Finished and Framed, OALL and Inspect these Beautiful Pictures and our Large Assortment of Art Frames and Mouldings.

R U E ı N £ S S E S