

RUBBLING WELL ROAD.

This is the Botten Row of Shanghai. Here one will see the most cosmopolitan crowd in the world, and one of the sights of this wonderful city is to watch the costly equipages of the wealthy passing along, each one determined to outdo the other in the luxuriousness of his turnout. A tramway service—one of the finest in the world has just been installed along this thoroughfare.

SCRATCHING BOARD AT SHANGHAI RACECOURSE.

The appointments are all of the most up-to-date description, and big prize money is given at the meetings. There is a very fashionable gathering of Europeans, and on race days the lawn is a most remarkable sight. The Chinese do not mix with the foreigners, but are compelled to occupy a separate enclosure further along the course, which is shown in another photograph.

MODERN CHINA—THE SHANGHAI-NANKIN RAILWAY.

Nothing is modernising China so much as the railways, which are run with Chinese officials—drivers, guards, etc.—but the traffic managers are Europeans—chiefly Australians. This line is admirably conducted, is most comfortable, and is fitted up with everything to be found on of the best lines in the West.

THE WESTERNISING OF CHINA ON THE SHANGHAI RACECOURSE. THE FIRST PICTURE SHOWS THE PORTION OF THE COURSE TO WHICH THE NATIVES ARE RESTRICTED, AND THE OTHER IS A VIEW OF THE LAWN.

