Englishmen, who have a horror of hasty legislation, must sometimes envy the cough and ready way in which the colonies dispose of difficul questions. We solve the licensing matter by giving no compensation at all, thus barring the door on all discussion as to time limits and amounts and levies. Similarly, we dismiss the question of religious educa-tion by giving none at all. But the House of Commons rejected the secular solution by 414 votes, and it has been trying to evolve a bill that shall do justice to all parties. It is most sincerely to be regretted that Mr. Runciman's atatesmanlike measures failed to be carto be regretted that Mr Runeman's state-mandlike measures failed to be carried by reason of the action of the extremists on both sides. It was far and away the best and fairest Education Bill that we have had as yet, and while remedying many injustices of Mr Balfour's Bill, it was not so neglectful of the justiciants of clurch schools as were the proposals of Mr Birrell and Mr McKenna. Englishmen are tolerant of delay, tolerant of long disension and repeated failure, because they are intolerant of anything that savours of injustice or interference with the rightful liberaties of the subject. A new country wants to make the pace and show the world how easy it is after all to dispose of difficult questions. But it is questionable whether we have the same traditional love of true liberty and justice to one class is often secured at the cost of gress injustice to another. gross injustice to another,

Speaking at the half-yearly meeting of the Bank of New Zealand last Friday, the chairman (Mr Beauchamp), stated that the profits of the bank for the six months ended September 30 were exceedingly satisfactory, and he confidently ceedingly satisfactory, and he confidently anticipated a like favourable result for the current financial year. The bank has pursued the policy of accumulating large reserves in preference to paying large dividends, and this has done much to inspire public confidence in the institution. The chairman dwelt on the temporary financial stringency, and expressed the opinion that the strong demand for our staple products and the rise in the price of wool and other pastoral and agricultural products, would soon redress the balance of the financial market in our favour; and the relative searcity of balance of the financial market in our favour; and the relative scarcity of money would be repaired as soon as ever the effects of the present nyward movement in market value had had time to make itself felt. This optimistic outlook for the future should be a sufficient answer to those who have been making ominous and pessimistic predictions regarding the linearial condition of the colony.

It seems a little late in the day to refer to the winning of the Davis Cup, but the news arrived last week white the portion of the paper containing these notes was already in the press, and our congratulations to the Deminion in general, and fawn tennis players, and Wild-ing in particular, bad of necessity to be held over till this issue. For it would held over till this issue. For it would indeed be ungracious and unfitting were such a feat to pass without some gratulatory remark. Wilding, by his brilliance and endorance, wested the tup almost out of the very grasp of the gallant Americans. The defeat of the supposedy incinely-be Brooks — ided of Australian tenuis players—seemed to make its possession a certainty for the Land of the Stars and Stripes, and it is a proud thing for the commonwealth and New Zoafand that they should have, in face Stars and Stripes, and it is a proud thing for the commonwealth and New Zeafand that they should have, in face of so Homeric a fight as that set up by America, been able to hold their own and retain the Cup, showing that it is not only in bootball that the best men in this part of the world can more than hold their own with Chi World champions. It is a pity the British Lawn Tonnis Association should have been suddenly shaken with a spacen or niggardlyness which caused them to refrain from sending a team to Australia to compete for the Cup, but we are proud to believe that had they done so the result must have been the same. Brookes and Wilding competed for the Cup in 1905, and went much knoles, and tried again in 1906, and twis not till fact year they succeeded in gaining the much desired trophy. That they should have succeeded in retaining it again is, as we have said, a feat of which every one of us may feel justifiable pride.

A RARE PLAN OF RUAPEKA-PEKA.

PRESENTED TO AUCKLAND CITY.

On page 23 of this issue we reproduce a plan of the famous Ruapekapeka pa, captured on January 11, 1846, after a bitter struggle. This plan was the property of Mr. C. Ruck, of Parnell, Auckland, whose father, the late Capt, Atkyns, played a distinguished part in the engagement, as will be seen from the following letter from his commanding officer. It is written rather over a year later:

> "Royal Engineer's Office, "Auckland, 10th August, 1847.

"Sir "Being about to give over the com-mand of the Royal Engineer Department in New Zealand to Lieut-Col. Bolton, in New Zealand to Lieut. Col. Bolton, R.E., I deem it but just before doing so to acknowledge the great obligation I am under for your services whilst serving in the field with me at Roapekapeka by your so gallantly, with the pioneers under your command, cutting away the dense wood, and removing every obstacle that obstructed the view of the batteries, under the very loss of the continuous ács, up to the very base of the enemies? ics, up to the very base of the enemies work, exposing yourself and those under your command to very great danger from the five of the enemy, and I have not the feast besitation in saving that was principally by your great exertion that the pa was taken much more speed-ily than it otherwise would have been.— I have the honour to be. Sir, your most obedient humble servant.

Hongi left on his visit to England on March 2nd, 1820, taking his friend Waikato with him.

Hongi was well received in England, and had an interview with King George IV., who gave him a behnet and George IV., who gave him a belinet and a suit of chain armour, which became as famous as their owner, and were used by him till his death. He was also loaded with presents from other persons, but his great desire was for gurs and of gurs he had but a few. On arriving in Sydney, Hongi sold his presents and bought muskets and powder enough to arm 300 men.

How he devastated the country and exterminated his enemies is well known. The armour was buried after his death, and has only just been recovered, and and has only just been recovered, and placed in the Wellington Museum.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

T is doubtful if New Zealand will ever be really progressive in the best sense of the word, till women sit in our Houses of Legislature In England they are discussing the use of an Upper House, and we in this country have often done the same. That is because both legislative chambers are composed exclusively of men, though 1 believe Press reporters employed in the House of Lords refer to that august body as "the old women" because of the presence of the bishops with their lawn sleeves and pions demeanour. There is no reason whatever why the Upper House both here and at Home, should not be note nore and at Home, should not be entirely for women, elected by women voters, and the Lower House would be for men, elected by men voters. This would make politics far more interesting, and it would do away with the many reproaches urged against a system that does not really represent the will of the mentle. people. </l> </l

For if you come to think of it, our pre-nt method is grossly unfair. Men will sent method is grossly unfair. Men will never infroduce reforms that tell against their own tastes and inclinations, and many of what we call "the crying evile of the day" remain unredressed because of the selfishness of the mere man. A House of women members could carry a bill to put a heavy tax on bachelors. This question was treated by our late candidates in a spirit of unbecoming levity.
Women nege that it is a tax on inxuries, and thus essentially democratic, and they ought to know. It is difficult to see any valid reason that yould be urged against it, there is no doubt that, once imposed, it would be cheerfully paid, and if heavy enough, our revenue should be consider-ably benefited. Another thing that would ably benefited. Another thing that would be gained by women sitting in Parliament would be the greater attention that would be given to questions of social reform in regard to female labour. Men are essentially sellish in these matters, and never consider the conditions under which women work. Women are noted for their considerate treatment of their own sex, as witness the way in which the average mistress always considers the comfort and happiness of any woman she employs.

But the greatest benefit of all to the community that would arise from having women legislators would be the great reform that could be effected in the male character. This is a thing our Parliaments have too long neglected. Men waste on selfish indulgence the money that should go to their wives. Smoking should be absolutely prohibited, as also clubs. How many a man spends on that should go to their wives. Smoking should he absolutely prohibited, as also clubs. How many a man spendy on tobacco in different forms a sam that would he more than sufficient to buy a really stylish snumer hat, and not a lew-stay at their club when they might be far more usefully employed in helping with the dishes and general tidying up, if men will not be unselfish of their own accord, they should be made unselfish by law; and if a woman cannot make a man contented with his home by her own attractiveness, the moral agents of the policeman and the god should be invoked to induce in him a spirit of content. As the famous Dr. Grimstone remarked on an historic occasion: "FII establish a spirit of trustful happiness and unnurmaring content in this school, if I have to flog every boy in it as long as I can stand over him"; or as a femperance advocate recently put it: "We'll make the men drink water, even if we have to make them do it at the end of the cat o' nine tails." A law could be passed compelling men to be home at a section than a first and the hours of the cat o' nine tails." A law could be passed compelling men to be home at a certain time at night, and the hours of business could be so regulated that all offices should be compelled to close at five o'clock, and thus the baconic wire, "Betained at office," would be impossible. Also, all buying and selling of canines should be prohibited, or hours fixed for mercantile transactions in these saimale, as by this means a check would be placed on men deserting the society of their wives on occasions all and sundry that they may go and see a man about a dog.

How strange it seems, now that we have found that men can be made good by Act of Parliament, to read of the old days when people believed in the power of the grace of God. Even as I write my eye falls on an old-fashioned tract. It is headed, "Make Home Comfortable," and says that if women thought more of their homes and their busband's com-fort, there would be fewer bad men. With what a curious Old World sound do the what a curious thit World sound do the words fall on our car that God's Holy Spirit, can make us good. Childish faith, some call it; childhoed's faith, if you will, for thee of us who were children when Phaneus was Consul. The modern poet says prayer is vain, the modern poet says prayer is vain, the modern porator says the gaol is our moral agent, both proclaim the way, of salvation to be through the ballot-box and the power of Parliament. Be it so. And yet from the far-away Galilean hills there comes the faint echo of a voice, an echo almost the faint echo of a voice, an echo almost of Parliament. Is it so, And yet river the far-away Galilean bills there comes the faint echo of a voice, an echo almost lost 'mid the din of faction and party strife, and we catch the tender accents of the man of sorrows, "No man cometa to the Father, but by me."
