A Deaf and Dumb Baronet

A most interesting personality is Sir Arthur Holburne Fairbairn, the third Baronet of Arwick in the county of Lancastr, the only bearer of a hereditary title in Great Britain who is deaf and dumb. The philanthropic work which he is doing for those who are afflicted in a similar manner, no less than his own intelligence and handsome appearance, make him distinctly a man of note. Situated at Rugby, and afterwards by private tuition he has shown much progress in learning to travel and study the heavy languages which is the. A friendly, kind, well-blessed man, with a certain aplomb for his condition, he is the last to give you an impression of sadness, having always a cheery look of his own which is often as not the impart to his visitors. There is little of the gloom that Sir Arthur has met with in travel is one of his delights, and he has wandered through Russia, Greece, and Iceland, Spain, Portugal, and Denmark; Norway, Sweden, and Germany, to say nothing of the countries nearer at hand—France, Belgium, and Holland. He has also visited the United States of America, and the results of his wanderings are not only a quantity of curiosities in the way of art and bric-a-brac, but an intimate personal knowledge of the various institutions in other lands which grapple with that subject—disinfecting at times to him the situation of the deaf and dumb.
