Copyright Story.

In the Matter of a Derelict.

By CAPTAIN F. H. SHAW.

HE "Uriah R. Juggins" had made two uneventful voyages, and already Captain Jinks was surfeited with ennui.

"A dog's life, that's what it is in my opinion," he observed nastily to his mate, who was trimming a pet corn with the bo'sun's sheath-knife, "Eat, work and sleep, that's all there is to do. No romance, no change, no nothin'."

Mr. Thomas sliced off about a square Mr. Thomas sliced off about a square inch of his second toe, because of the vigorous stamp that Jinks gave on the coaly deck. When the mate get aft to the poop again—Jinks thought he was going to break off the bowsprit by the way he clung to it and yelled—the captain had grown purple in the face with simple joy. Thomas was merely crimson with anything but happiness.
"There'll be somethin' mighty startlin' son with anything but happiness.

"There'll be somethin' mighty startlin' happenin' soon!" yelled the mate, hobbling about on one foot, and nursing the damaged member tenderly, bleed to death?"

bleed to death?"
"I've heard it's a painless way," retorted Jinks sympathetically. "And a new mate might liven things up a bit. Goodness knows they need it. You've got no sense of humour, you 'aven't."
"Oh, 'aven't 1? Anyway, I don't make a blame' Lotharier of myself over every peticut what shows in the offin'. I'm 'unnorist enough for that."
"Well, when I finds the piece of skin you've sliced off'n your toe," said Jinks,

"Well, when I finds the piece of skin you've sliced off'n your tae," said Jinks, with a broad smile, "I'll keep it. My sea-boots need new soles, any'ow."

Thomas had nothing to say at the moment, and went forward, with his very eyes bristling. Happening to discover the boy asking the cook if he wanted a new cover for the coal bunker, because he'd just found the sliced-off corn, Thomas vented his ill humour on that youthful trader and then leaned sulkily over the forbard bulwarks, trying to think youthful trader and then leaned sulvily over the for ard bulwarks, trying to think of the sharp answers be might have made to the skipper if he'd only remembered them in time. He thought about so many that his good-nature returned, and when he found the cook boiling a pair of pants he asked him facetiously if he was running short of meat for the soup for the crew. The cook looked on him out of steam-filled eves, and said he'd never run the crew. The cook looked on him out of steam-filled eyes, and said hed never run short of meat so long as there was so much dashed check going about. Therefore Thomas went aft, and squided at the barometer.

"You was talkin' about monotony," be the barometer.

"You was talkin' about monotony," be said after an hour to Jinks. He cast an uneasy eye at the weather as he spoke. "Don't you think there's a gale comin' up from the sou'-west? You won't complain about sameness then, I reckon." Now, if there was one thing Captain Jinks hated worse than widows, it was a gale. Though he had used the sea as boy and man for a matter of thirty-live years, to say nothing of a couple of trips in a steam collier, he had never got over a slight but very effectious tendency towards seasiekness. It was no matter that he ascribed it to pickles and tinned meatseasick he was whenever a storm came on. When he followed the mate's glance and saw the steely glitter that was comand saw the steely glitter that was coming over the sky, and how the piled cloud-masses were shutting out the sun, cloud-masses were shutting out the sun, he put his hand to the pit of his stomach and emitted a low grown.

"I'll tell the cook to fry some of that good fat hacen for supper," said Thomas cruelly. "It'll settle you down confortably for the night. It's goin' to blow like mad, you see if it won't. I wish I 'adn't pawned my oilskins to buy heer. If you'd been generous, I'd never have needed to. But then—well, beer's beer. needed to. But then—well, beer's beer, So you'll have to keep on deek yourself all night.

all hight."
"I've got a spare suit of oilskins," said Jinks ingratiatingly. "I intended giving them to you for your birthday. And they aren't bad ones, neither."
"It was my birthday last week," said Thomas, "so you needn't pretend to be wot you nin't. Besides, it's the captain's duty to keep on deck when the sea's rough."

Jinks was painfully aware that such was the case, but he loathed the prospect.

A gale was a capital thing to talk about, when a woman's admiring eyes were glancing timidly at him, and a soft voice was whispering: "I do think sailors are brave men!" but in reality, with wet decks and a howling wind, it was something very unpleasant.

"And, besides," went on Thomas, "a wettin' allus gives me toothache. takes the best part of a bottle o' brandy to keep the henemy at bay." Jinks remembered then that his medicinal brandy had all been used up to placate the cook when that individual had refused to serve a meal on the occasion of a public holiday. Apparently there was nothing for it but to accept the situation, and do the best. Then a solution presented itself. It was almost trivial, but it might work.

some new ones."

some new ones."
"It won't work," grimaced Thomas,
"There's six bags of spuds yet. Nasty ones, too," he said with a reminiscent sniff. "All spots an' pimples. I did hear the bos'n say that he'd been fed on various things during his time at sea, but never on pig's meat. But I s'pose you'll not mind wot the crew says.
You'll be thinkin' of them there golden suvrius you're savin."
"You mind your one."

You mind your own business," snarled "You mind your own business," snarled Links, to whom the suggestion of mean-ness was a sore point. It rankled, be-cause he knew at the back of his mind that there was reason in the suggestion, "Well, that's got nothin' to do with the

"Well, that's got nothin' to do with the gale." said Thomas, as a merry wavelet frisked over the brigantine's bow, and harried aft in a whirl of spray. Jinks wiped the saft out of his eyes, and leaned runninatively over the side. He was feeling unwell. His stomach was several sizes too large for his holy, and it would not keep in one place all the time. There was also a weird dizziness in his head.

"Tisn't as if the Urish was a seaworthy craft," said the mate, who was chewing tobacco with callous zest. "She ain't.

She's a hog in bad weather. But thereing tobacco with callous zest. "She ain't. She's a hog in bad weather. But there-thac'll only make you uneasy, so I won't say any more about it. Only, I'm glad I can swim. By the way, did you notice you the rats went ashore last time at Limchouse Reach! Every one of 'em went; but that's only a silly superstition." He went below, leaving Jinks to the companionship of his own thoughts, which were not pleasant. For the gallant skipper knew that his whip was not all that could be desired. With the object of hastening the day when he should be able to leave the calling he detected, and settle down in condort on shore, and settle down in comfort on shore, Jinks had stinted repairs to the craft, Jinks had stinted repairs to the craft, and she was now groaning in every timber, and leaking in every seam.

The gale was rising, too. Every fresh gast of wind had an added force, and the upper timbers of the brigantine were cracking ominously. Jinks called out the hands, and reduced sail, and then, with his oilskins wrapped closely about him, and feeling miserable in every inch of his body, he set to work to keep harassing body, he set to work to keep harassing thought at hay. But though he tried to think of every little episode in love's lists that had studded his chequeted career, he that had studded his chequered career, he was unable to keep from brooding over the possibilities the night held. The North Sea was getting its back up now. A long succession of foaming, surging waves swept up to the labouring craft, and deluged her from stem to stern in spray. Jinks knew that it was going to be a bad night, but how bad he did not fully realise until the cook came aft, and asked him what he was going to do about

it. "About what?" asked the mystified and

"About what?" asked the mystified and thoroughly misetable skipper. "Why, abaut this 'ere puff o' wind. I washed my shirt this afternoon, and hung it in front o' the galley fire to dry, an' here is't gone and got wet through. An' it's the only one, too. I think you'd better make for shelter."

But Jinks sent the cook forward to the accompaniment of such phrases as made the man of pots and paus sture, and caused him to take down a grimy notebook and the stub of a peneil, with which he entered the skipper's observations for further use.

further use.

The night shut down on the foaming, seething water. Fierce gosts of slatting hail came tearing down out of the son'-west, and they smote the skipper pain-fully on the face. From the lighted cabin below he could smell the scent of hot coson brewed in a tonato tin over a blush lamp, and, the thought of his mate taking his case made him wild with rags and ence.

taking his case made him wild with rage and ency.

"You'd better come on deck, and not skulk away there like a woman," he yell-ed, lifting the skylight, just as a vicious spray hurthed over the rail.

"Talkin' about women," said Thomas

"Talkin' about women," said Thomas meditatively, lifting the tin off the lamp with the tail of his coat, "low about that woman at—'ere, wot do you think you're at?" He might well have asked, for the spray had descended to the cabin, and had deluged him. The recon was the worst sufferer, and was thrown away in disgust a moment later.
"Well," said Jinks, with some approach to cheerfulness, "I'm not the only uncomfortable man abourd this ship now." From below, through the gusts of tho omfortable man abourd this ship now." From below, through the gusts of the gale, came the sound of Thomas' remarks. He seemed to be disturbed somewhat.

Midnight came, and found the situation unchanged, save that the wind blew still harder. Grouning her protests to the unhandsome treatment that was being shown her, the Uriah B. Juggius swirled through infinite darkness, and played a game of "Puss, puss, come to my corner," with herself, as she leaped and kicked to the heel and toe of the racing seas. In a well-found craft, with plenty of searoom, there was unthing to cause any man, the slightest apprehension, but Jinks began to get more and more dismayed as time drove on.

Black forms showed up out of the darkness, and presently the whole erew of the ness, and presently the whole erew of the mass forms showed up fur of the dark mass, and presently the whole erew of the vessel were mustered on the after deck.

"We stood it as long as we could," growled the bo'sm, "but we afu't cold bath manines. Once a year's enough for the likes o' me, and this is ondecent. Besides, I've broke my pipe in the dark,"

Jinks sent them down to the stuffy adin, and told them to make themselves confortable in the mate's berth. But presently there was the sermidling of heavy feet on the wooden ladder that led to the endey, and Thomas' head appeared. Jinks did not see him until he was at his elbow, and when he spoke the skipper only just saved binself from ging overheard by clutching at the boom, which swing him over to the office side of the deck an instant lafter.

"She's leakin' hard," yel'ed Thomas, or the neek an instant latter, "She's leakin' hard," yel'est Thomas, "It's comin' into my recon, The thor's covered all over and I direary your rooms woose. I didn't look, but I heard things swishing about."

The nen appeared shortly afterwards, Greatly against his will the ho'sm was sent forward with a sounding red, to see how much water was in the well, and he returned to say that he made it eight feet out of the feet. rising fast. Vhat shall we do?" asked Jinka

What "What shall we do?" asked dinks showly, with four recepting over him. A voice from the background suggested, "Avin' a drink to cheer folks up a bit," which remark remained manswered. It was Thomas who supplied the idea, "We'll have to leave be," he said with emotion. "We'll ave to take to tae beats an make for the shore, I'm afraid."

an' make for the shore, Un alraid."
"You can leave her if you like," said Jiaks manfully, "but Un captain here, and I'll stick to the ship." The cabin hoy logan to whisthe "I'll stick to the ship, lads," through his treth, but he was promptly kicked into the scupppers by the mate.

Undoubtedly the situation was serious in the extreme. The gale was not in-creasing now, and, inteed, showed signs of diminition, but there was a solden heave to the brigantine that told of her sorry plight. If was a question whether she would live till morning.

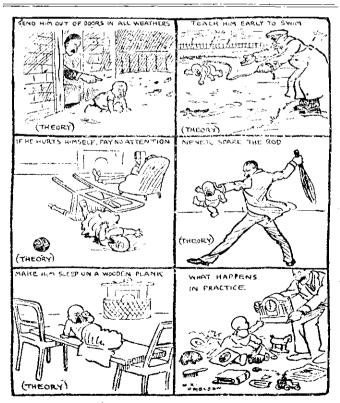

suc would like III morning.

"I'll stay belind," said Jinks manfully. It was not that he was imbued with any gallant ideas of going down with the ship, but I'l there was danger in a briganting, there was certainly more in a small heat.

with the ship, but it there was danger in a brigortime, there was certainly more in a small beat.

"No, you won't," snapped the mafe, "Ow'l we got on ashore, without you, the you think? You're the only man wot's got any money, an' we'd look pretty blighters landin' with empty pockets, an' all the pribs shul, too.

"Yes, we'll make yer come with us," grandbed the crew from the dirkness, links went forward despairingly, found the sounding rod, and unserwed the little brass cap that gnauled the well-pipe. He slipped the rod down, and drew it up again with bated breath. Then he extried it gingerly to the side light, and saw that it marked nine feet of water in the hold. He made up his mind swiftly.

HOW TO BRING UP BABIES.

According to most buchelors, babies ought to be hardened early in life by exposure to the elements and stern treatment generally. The backelor continues to think thus until be becomes a married man. Then he leads his first-born with every sort of luxury, and turns hardening theory into indulgent