une of them as knows how to keep a gromise. She was Colonel Bagot's servant girl, and the track of our true love had run smooth enough until the trouble came.

What trouble? Now you're askin'. Well, I suppose I'll have to let it out at last. To cut the yarn short, it was a lonely fight in an empty bar-room, a fair an' square stand-up ding-dong go, but I got in an unlucky lett-hander which landed his head fair on the brass knob of the fire grate, and the fool died in hospital. Reston, you know. Eh, Mr. Rhodes? You remember the little affair, do you Lord! I'm giving myself away, even now!"

The old man suddenly gave a violent start, and tried to rise, but he was too weak, and sank back, fainting. But a nip from the bottle revived him, and after a while he continued, though in a somewhat subdued voice:

"I may as well finish, now that I've gone so far. I think I've had my last spree. Feels like the time a' comin' to twell, well! Never mind that. Whiche was I? Yes, I worked my way back and crawled up at dark, and give. It must shorten up this yarn, it ain't nice in the tellin'. I've list of course Kitty was willin' to be, stole, and tramped right birdey over the ranges and through the bush with me, her pretty feet sore and tired, and her hair all out of curl from campin' in the open war, for we had to keep clear o' the ment tracks and settlements, as the folk wright be askin' oncomfortable questions.

"On the third day, when Kitty had though I've the range for the rest of her natval life, I made for old Ropai's kainga, and there my poloured friends fixed us up with a big supply o' tucker and a dug-out canoe, and I paddled away down the Waipa to seek round for uttermost seclusion and bliss! I found a likely spot, miles from supply o' tucker and a dug-out canoe, and I paddled away down the Waipa to seek round for uttermost seclusion and diliss! I found a likely spot, miles from the beaten pakeha tracks, and rigged up bark whare, and our prospects and kumara beds flourished. Of course we obeyed the Maori law, and got a tohunga to mutter his matri-monial charms over four cere-monial weddin. There weren't no cake now re-care.

he mutter his matri-monial charms over four cere-monial weddin. There weren't no cake nor no cards!

"I should have told you that, Connor, the town policeman, and for long been wanting my fi-ancy to marry him, though he knew that she was my properly. So, when Kitty was stole, Connor guessed that I had resurrected my-neif, and what must he do but start to follow up my trail, like the snivelling blighter he was. He had old Tewae, the pracker, to help him. Remember Tewae, Mr. Rhodes? You don't, eh? Why, he was the bloodhound who dug young Murray, the sailor, out of the Waitomo Caves after he'd shot Pemberton for argylving about dividin'th spoil they'd wollared out of the East Coast mail!

"Well, Connor reckoned on trackin' me, and so gettin' a good healthy murder case, as well as a collarin' of what he calculated was his girl, and posin' as a hero of the first water in clatchin' the languishin' female from outer the willyun's grasp!

languishin' female from outer the spillyun's grasp!

"And right enough, after months of pimpin' round, and hidey go-seek, he collared me! I had left our whare early one morning to go cel fishin; and I had a good haul, but Kitty never cooked khose cels! A cold revolver muzzle against my ear was Chapter the oneth, three days' trudging in handcuffs to the town lock-up was Chapter the twoth of that little affair, and I wondered what Kitty thought?

"I wouldn't own up to murder, but the Jury brought me in Guilty." The judge thought fit to rule it in to me. 'A well merited sentence,' says he. 'You have evaded justice long enough. May the Lord have merey on your soul.' And evaded justice long enough. May the Lord have mercy on your soul. And then he went to his dinner.

"A few days later, Connor bawled through my door that he'd got a week's feave of absence, and was off to bring Kitty home, also, that I was to have a six-foot drop. He took care, though, that three inches of kauri boarding lay between us before he chose to cheer me up with this little eppy-tone of news, But his spite was soon to suffer fatty be generation of the heart, for he didn't get away as soon as he had expected to. re-generation of the heart, for he didn't get away as soon as he had expected to, and in a couple of days he was forced to carry very different tidings into the condemned cell-mothing more nor less than a slap-up reprieve, and my order of release! He sukily told me that the real murderer had had a fit of remorse, and had confessed! I was staggered a bit, nat'rally, but col-lected my wits and said: The Lord's will be done, or some such language, just to allae my sushicion, you know and to lected my with and said: The Lord's will be done, or some such language, just to allay my suspicions, you know, and to hide my feelin's a bit.

"When I got away from the jail, I set straight off to Kitty, wonderin', and settled in my own mind that my proxy (they would not tell me his name) was either a lunatic, or someone too scart to commit susanside, so thought he'd get the Government to carry out his little short cut to Glory for him. But that was his business. Mine was home and Kitty. So on I trudged, merrily enough, and building all sorts of castles in the air (Chatoo dee Spain, as Crapaud calls'em) shout our shiftin' to the town, and holding our heads up among the folk, and me gettin' on the School Committee like a respectable city father, and—er—But when I arrived within sight of our whare, tired and weary, though cheery as a locust, I got a sudden shock on seein' that no smoke came from the clod, chimney. Boys! The very soul seemed to go out of my body when I found that Kitty had gone, and that she had left no sign. Yes, one sign I saw the marks of Kitty had gone, and that she had left no aign. Yes, one sign 1 saw the marks of reveal—ation, an awful thought, of a heroine; a self-sacrificing Kitty—flashed into my mind, and I ran all the way to the cells. As I had been directly concerned in the case, I got immediate permission to go in and institot inquires. I found that my nightmare of a notion was all too true, for Kitty had bravely carried out her cracked-up yarn, but woman-like, broke down when she saw me, and told me all about it, and then she put her arms round my neck, and me, and told me all about it, and then she put her arms round my neck, and lung on! Boys, I tell ye, the devil came into my soul, and I shut my teeth hard. I gripped Kitty round the waist, and fetched out my sheath-knife.

"The warder came first, but I had a strong wrist then-a-days. Kitty's scream at the blood-flow fetched Mr. Policeman Connor, but I saw him in time, and he dropped with a broken jaw. My course was clear, for the old lock-up boasted no system of high walls and turnkeys. I half carried Kitty, for she was too dazed and faint to run, and we made off into the bush."

us, we soon felt secure enough, and by-and by welcomed the signs o' Christ-mas a' comin' on the pohutukawas. But one morning, just about when Christ-mas Day would be sending out the holiday-makers (lucky beggars), a big. Aioliday-makers (lucky heggars), a big, white-sailed pleasure yacht came skimming into our bay. We could see that picnickers were aboard, by the cut o' their clothes. Presently they came hut, which would nat'rally attract attention in that solitary spot. We hadn't time to get away, and, besides, Kitty wasn't too well anyway, so I had to put a bold face on it, and went out as if I was almighty pleased to welcome the visitors to our abode! You can imagine my disgust when I saw, all too late, that a laughing lass had 'snapped' me with an infernal three-legged camera she had quickly fixed up. I suppose my wild rigquickly fixed up. I suppose my wild rig-out gave me a sorter Robinson Cruson appearance. Howsomever, this cameca appearance. Howsomever, this camera affair was dangerous, though on consultin' Kitty when the yacht had gone and we were at last alone, we decided that only deuced bad luck would bring that ploty-graph under official gaze. Besides, and this is what was the decidin' fackter, the main thing was, that Kitty was not fit to take to the hush again just then. So we risked circumstances.

"Well, as nothing happened to alar

"But circumstances was our enemy. I tell ye, boys, inside of a month, as we were peacefully finishin' our evenin' meal o' roast clams, and yarnin' about layin' a store o' tucker for the winter, our blessed whare was surprised and rushed! My wits gathered up the facts in a second, but my heart seemed to drop clean outer my body and my brain recled, when I saw that no less than seven armed men were coming at us!

But Despair beats numbers. I tore our slab table off its posts and heaved our slab table off its posts and heaved it at their leader, who dropped, and even in my wild fury I recognised the features of the warder I had left for dead in the lock-up. The second man blazed a pistol at me, but his arm-was knocked up, and he fell back from a blazin' root that Kitty thrust in his face. How we did it, I can't tell you, but after a mad and desperate scramble, and though runnin' awful risks from the pepperin pistol bullets, we got into the bush unhurt, but just about in fit mood to join hands and take a flyin' leap over the cliff, and end matters on the rocks below! But the blankness o' Death is a bitter notion to young folk, and Love seems to cling to Life! Poor Kitty could not travel so I gathered her a heap o' moss notion to young folk, and Love seems to cling to Life! Poor Kitty could not travel so I gathered her a heap o' moss and made her as confortable as it was nossible in the gatherin' darkness, and then I went back to re-con-noiter. Picture my feelin's when I saw the raiders sittin' round the glowin' asles of what had been by Home, and a loved home too, for there Peace had dwelt, and Love had softened Care! I turned to go back to my wife, but again bad luck followed me, for I lost my way in the darkness of the bush, and daren't coose to her for fear o' bringin' the men after us. So Kit was left alone, and when, after a Kit was lett alone, and when after a cruel night, I crept along at streak o' dawn and found the hidin' place where I had left her, they were both dead and Again the old man paused; his voice had died away to a whisper. We looked at him inquiringly, and Rhodes ven-tured, "Both?"

"Yes, both," and after another long drawn silent pause, "Both Kit and her kiddy! What troubles me most—I can't speak any louder, I had to bolt away, for I heard the police startin' off to look for us, and when immediate danger is at hand, no matter how sick o' Life we may be, 'Life is sweet.' They were only a few yards off, but I got away, though I hadn't even time to kiss the dead lips I just said, 'God rest. . . !' I must turn in now, boys. I'm quite warm Cam old man. Good night, all!"

We helped him to his bunk, and then contained silent, listening to the rain, and thinking. That silence was Kitty's remained Elegy!

The next morning broke fine and clear and Rhodes woke me up early.

"Come here," he said, and beckoned me towards Nat's bunk. I went over, and shook the old man to awaken him, but suddenly stopped to listen, and then gently drew the bush tug over his face for Nat had joined his "Kit and her kiddy!"

her twelve-and-sixpenny boots, leading her twelve-and-saxpenny boots, leading off on the mointain track, a real dan-gerous short cut to town! So after a night's rest, back I goes on the same tramp, hungry, tirgd, and puzzled, but feelin' sorter relieved to know that I was feelin' sorter relieved to know that I was following on Kitty's track!

"I met Tewae the tracker, who told me that some woman, whose name he had forgotten, had confessed to hitting Reston on the head with a lump of firewood, that she had followed him up to the pub because he had jilted her; and got him alone in the bar-room, and in a fit of fury had landed him a crack on the head with a piece o' rata whe hauled fit of fury had landed him a crack on the head with a piece o' rata she hauled outer the fire! The Court believed her on oath, of course, and all as in a dream (for Connor and Co. had kept me in the dark) I had got my walking ticket, for things in the justice line then-a-days were not like they are now, you know. Bless me, no. Why, I remember down at Paterangi Bush, old Capt'n Loram fining a pai o' mine a bottle o' whisky for bengin' the Bush Clerk on the cokernut with a rika-stump, and the liquor had to be fetched and lowered before the Court broke up!

in silence. Another "first mate's" nip at the bottle seemed to revive the old man, and presently he cleared his throat, and in a half mutter went on. Another "first mate's' in silence.

"I must pass over a long time now, how we lived on fern roots and tahow we lived on fern roots and ta-wheras, and tucker begged from friend-ly Maoris; how we hid, tramped, and hid for months and months, till we hit on a retreat away on the West Coast, where a big kauri bush backed the coastline, and, where the sea-heaches where a big sauri one coastline, and where the sea-heaches provided us with plenty of pipis and pawas. By the way, we call that bush district 'Hokinga,' now.

"My rough out whare gave us shelter, poor enough though, for the few tools I had hegged from old Ropai were not fitted for mansion building, exactly. My poor girl suffered hardships its outer the question to tell of. You can all imagine what she had to put up with! Patience! Why, she twisted maunga manung around a stick o' dry puriri, and rubbed it inho dead tawa pulp until she got a fire a goin! She was a female Mark Tapley, she was, and never a complaint did she make, no matter how we fared, bless her.
