automatic revolver was American. But the man himself, by the cast of his fea-tures, his colouring, the texture of his skin, a certain wistfulness in the lines of his mouth. Juboff decided to be Slavic. He guessed him to be a fellow Russian; and his exile heart went out to the un conscious face on his pillow.

When at last the stranger awoke it as to an obstimute silence, apparently to no more than a semi-uncon-ຕ່ຳກາງສຸກເຂສ Duboff spoke to him in English, French, German, Norwegian, Polish and lastly Russian, but obtained not so much as Russian, but obtained not so much as the flicker of an eyelid to show that he understood. From this state of collapse, so unlike the indomitable force which he had displayed on the day of the wreck, the stranger passed into a violent pneu-monia, which bade fair to do what storm and mure had as ejumithed with the storm and surge had so signally failed to ac complish

For days he hung between life and fleath, as precariously balanced there in the guarded quiet of the doctor's room, Reath as the guarded quiet of the doctof's room, as on the roeling fragment of wreck, amid the thunder of the hurricane. But sleepless care and devotion pulled him through. There was Duboff's boy to help him in the struggle—a vigilant and thoughtful watcher by the bedside. There was Duboff's old housekeeper, Mrs. Mc-farrigle, to take her turn at the task. And Duboff wrestled with death for him as he himself had wrestled with the surges for the stricken sailor.

There came a morning when the sick man opened same, inquiring eyes, and stared about the clean, homely little good with its one window wide open to Food with its one window wide open to the sharp sea air. They were deepset eyes, melancholy and visionary. For some minutes they were obviously puzzled, as if their owner could not make out how he came to be in these surroundings. The unplastered walls, puzzied, as if their owner could not make out how he came to be in these surroundings. The unplastered walls, decorated with prints from illustrated journals, the sturdy serviceable furni-ture, most of it obviously home-made, the spotiess coarse linen, the bright cov-erlet of patchwork, all were scratinised in turn. And then the low ceiling, of light, clean spruce, traversed by sawn and planed scanthrgs. At last memory came back into the questioning eyes, and the man realised that he must be in some remote fishing village of the Labrador roast. Laboriously, step by step, he groped his way through the storm, the wreck, the desperate struggle, up to tas-moment when he had let himself drop with his burden from the skoping mast, and been grasped, in the suffocating yor-fex of those great surges, by some strong swimmer who had come miracu-lously to save him. He was very brave, lously to save him. He was very brave, that man, he thought: #hat

The door opened. A short, broad-built old woman in blue grey homespun stopped softly but briskly into the room and approached the bedskie with a cup and spoon in her hand. Her eyes mot his, and at the new look in them she gave a little exclamation of delight Ha and spoon in her hand. Her eyes mea-dis, and at the new look in them she gave a little exclamation of delight. He spoke to her — but it was in a tongue she could not understand; and her wrinkled, ruddy old face clouded again, as she jumped to the conclusion that his mind was wathering.

"Arrah, now," she answering. "Arrah, now," she answered crooningly, as to a baby, "be aisy wid ye, an' don't t-hry to talk. Take this, now, loike a little man." And seating herself on the chair by the bedside she attempted to give him semabling from the out him something from the cup.

But the sick man pushed her hand side—abruptly, as the sick will. aaide "What place is this? Where am I?" he demanded in clear English.

Mrs. McCarrigle looked surprised.

"Why, shure, ye're at Pratt's Harbour," she replied. "An' where else would ye be, if not at the bottom of the say?"

The stranger mused a moment, still motioning away the cup: "And whose house is this?" he asked.

"The docthor's, av coarse!" came the BRAWAT.

Answer. "What doctor's?" went on the stranger. Mrs. McCarrigle's face showed a degree of astonishment that was not far from disapproval. The idea of any human being having to ask what doctor's! "Why, Ducthor Peter's-whose else's rould it be?--what hauled ye out o' the asy."

"Ab, yes!" murmured the stranger, ro-"Ab, yes!" morning of salvation, "But "membering that grip of salvation, who is Doctor Peter?"

who is Dector Peter?" Mrs. McCarrigle was grieved at such-ignorance. A sudden sound of loud sizz-ing came from the kitchen. She jumped sup set down the cup and spoon upon the chair, and exclaimed warmly: "Shure an' he's an angel o' light, that's wh-hat he is, an' ye'd ought to know it, sorr. An' there's the pot a-billin' over." Bbe buatled from the room, closing the "door behind her; and the sick mas lay back with his eyes upon the ceiling, pon-dering. It troubled him that the man's name should be Peter.

Some five minutes later the door opened again. This time the visitor was a bright faced, slim hoy, with large grey eyes and longish, tunbled, yellow-brown hair.

He beamed frankly on the sick man, seated himself on the edge of the bed seared numself on the edge of the bed with a businesslike air, and announced, "You're better. I'm so glad." Then he took up the cup and spoon which Mrs. Mc-Carrigle had abandoned, and decreed in a quaint voice of authority, "You must be good and take this at once. Father said we must be very particular about it while he was away."

The sick man smiled in his ragged beard, took the dose obediently, and tried to say "thank you," but was interrupted by the boy wiping his lips carefully with a handkerchief.

"There," said the child, with an air of "There," saw the child, with an air or official satisfaction, "now you must go to sleep. And I think you will be much better when my father gets back. If you want me just ring this little bell." "But tell me, who is your father?" demanded the sick man eagerly.

e boy turned at the door.

"Why, don't you know " he asked in-cently. "He is Doctor Peter Duboff, nocently. who saved you. But you really must not who save you'll but you really must not talk, or you'll be having a temperature again, and that's very bad for you, you know." He closed the door firmly; and the sick man turned over on his pillow, with his face to the wall.

When Duboff returned that evening from a Bick visit in a neighbouring covo from a sick visit in a neighbouring cove, he found that the stranger, though clearly convalescent, had relapsed into his old silence. Not a word could he persuade from those close, dark-bearded lips. And no more would the sick man speak with Mrs. McCarrigle or the boy, beyond an occasional "Please," or "thank you," low-toned but contreous. But Duboff, appar-ently unconscious of this strange reserve, was unwearied, as ever, in his admin-istration and his thoughtful care. "A few days later, coming in lake in the atternoon, when a red.glory of sumset was flooding across the stranger's bed, he said, cheerfully: "You are getting on so well, my friend, that I think you may sit up a while to morrow."

A few days later, coming in late in the afternoon, when a red-glory of sunset

"Thank you," said the stranger, with t looking at him. This was the first time he had opened out

This was the first time be had opened his mouth in Duboff's hearing, and Duboff was delighted. Scating himself by the bed, he began to talk in Russian. "Forgive me," said he, "if I speak in what I imagine to be your own tongue.

what I imagine to be your own tongue. I do not ask any questions. I don't want to pry into your affaird. But I am a Russian: I think that you are also, and my heart goes out to a fellow countryman. It is a great joy to me to speak once more the speech of my own pcople." "I am a Russian. I was beginning to forget it—Russia seema so very far off. I must not forget I am a Russian," mut-tered the stranger.

tered the stranger. "I knew it," cried Duboff warmly, apmatic in the sick man's reply. If half stretched forth his hand, but at ones sortened forth his hand, but at once withdrew it. Then he went on to talk, as if just for the joy of feeling the old music on his lips. He told of the life of the fisher folk in this forgotten corner of the world, of his work among them, both ashore and afloat, of the wild tempests that harried the coasts, of the wrete, of the west evenes whild tempests that harried the coasts, of the wrecks, of the vast snaces of solitude in behind the hills, of the frec-dom, the bigness, and the blowsed peace. Then he got up and said: "Good-night, my friend. 11 not see you till to-morrow, as I have an all-night case over in Sandy Cove But and the solution of the solution. McOarrigle will look after you. And to morrow you shall fast to-morrow you shall feet yourself a man again."

As Duboff had prophesied, on the mor-As Duboft had propressed, on the mut-row the sick man felt himself so much stronger that he was eager to be up; but while being dressed, at times he seemed to shrink from the Doctor's At length it was accomplished. and Duboff, halt-carrying him, got him out into a great, padded chair on the porch, where he could dreach himself in the oun, and look out most touch. oun, and look out upon the now ling waters of the harbour. The smiling grey, straggling village, presided over by its white washed church, lay out-spread beneath him. The sin gleaned on the sails of half a dozen boats just entering the harbour. The stranger's eyes swept the scene with an intensity interest that was almost ferocious. They rested at last on the figure of Duboff's boy, at some childish play at the foot of the garden. He heard Mrs. Mc-Carrigle rattling dishes in the kitchen, and all at once he felt ridiculously hunger nungry. Suddenly Duboff took a revolver from his pocket, and handed it to him. "Here's your gun, friend," said he careleasly. "It was badly rusted by the salt water; but I think I've got it into pretty good shape for you. It's a beau-tiful weapon." The side man took it and took it.

The sick man took it and onened the chamber. "Where are the cartridges?" he asked, "Where are the cartridges?" he asked, apparently forgetting to say,

" Duboff laughed softly.

"I think they were done for. But I can let you have all you want. The gun is of the same calibre as my own." The sick man made as if to drop the weapon, but changed his mind, and slipped it into his pocket.

"Thank you," said he. "I shall want only one."

"One cartridge won't go farl" re-marked the doctor. "It will," contradicted the stranger.

"It will carry me a long, long journey,-Peter Ivanovitch."

Peter Ivanovitch." 'As he spoke the name, he turned his head, and for the first time looked Duboff straight in the eyes. Duboff returned the gaze with kindly concern, and apparently saw nothing strange in the fact that his guest was aware of his full name. "If you want to use it on yourself," he answered, "Tm afraid TI have to withdraw my offer."

The sick man continued to eye him piercingly. "My name," said he, "is Sergius Mili-by hanc, said he, a Sergus Mil-kov-Serge Nikolaiewitch-of the Central Committee, Third Division. You must have forgotten much in three years, Peter Ivanovitch, or you would know the only alternative. If that one cart-ridge is not for me-it is for the man ringe is not for me-it is for the man who broke his oath that day in Kiev." Juboff laughed gently. Never before had he realised how far away he had grown from his old self. At last, he was free of the yery hast showed.

grown from his old self. At last, he was free of the very last ahreds of doubt. The intensity of his guest's carnestness seemed unreal, impossible to him. "No. Serge' Nikolaievitch, I cannot agree to that either," he answered cheer-fully, as if the proposition were one of the most column in the proposition were one of

This, as in the proposition were one or the most ordinary in the world. . "It must be you, or me!" persisted the sick man, almost pleadingly now. "It cannot he you, of course. I cannot lift my hand against my benefactor, my saviour, my protector. But I can save "It bounds he mains the prior I can save Baylour, may protector. But I can save my honour by paying the price. I shall have to go over. Give ane that one cart-ridge, Peter Ivanovitch."

"Noge, Peter Ivanovitch." "No, of course it cannot be I," said Duboff musingly. "That's out of the question. I have too much to do here, I am needed. But neither can it be you. You are too good a mun to be spared, Serge Nikohievikoh. You are needed, too." Then his voice changed, grew solemn, and rang with authority. "I gave you your life, when it was done, quite surely done. I have a claim upon it, and I commit it to your keeping." The sick man dropped the question for ie moment. "Where is the sailor I saved?" he \mathbf{t} usked, a sudden light in his eyes. Duboff pointed to the little churchyard.

"You did all man could," said he. "But you did not save him, except from a sea grave. He was dead when we lifted him into the boat."

An expression of the keenest disap

"Of course," he exclaimed bitterly, "I had to fail there, too. At every point Med butters, At every point but you can keep your cartridges, Poter Ivanovilch. I will not shoot myself. That has always will not shoot myself. That has always secund to me cowardly. But I will go back and give myself up to the Com-mittee, and they will execute mc. I will save my honour." "Tes," said Duboff. "In effect, for that curious rag, you will betray met No! I think you must not do that, my friend."

The sick man wrung his gaunt fing "I am hedged about on every side!" he cried. "What am I to do!"

"As you see," said Duboff very quiet-"As you see," said Duboff very quet-ly, "there is much, very much, to be done for our brothers right here. Stay with me and help me to do it." "But I have given my word. And I am a gentlomant" said Milkov, "True," agreed Dr. Poter simply. There was allence between them for records minutes. The hoy laurhod at

There was succe or successful and a successful and the boy Isugind at the foot of the garden. Again came a rattle of dense from the sanctum al. Mrs. 'MoCarrigie.

"But you also, you were a genileman," said the sick man, pondering the words as he moke them.

"True," agreed Duboff assin. He was trying to remember how he had once felt on the subject.

felt on the subject. "Yet, if you are a gentleman no longer," west on Milikov, "it is strange that I am unable to feet that you have deteriorated in any acnse. It is pos-sible, perhaps, that one may do as you have done, and still be a gentlemant." "Indeed!" said Duboff doubtfully. "I wonder. I have thought about that a good deal, when I had time."

"Ah," cried the other, in a voice of "Ah." cried the other, in a voice of sudden and strong resolution. "I have not thought about it till this moment, Yet I have felt decided. I will stay here with you." He held out his hand, and Duboff grasped it, "I perceive that it appears to me, in my own heart, nobler and better, and more useful, and at the same time far more interesting, to save life than to destroy it. I will loars to geolad in saving that, poor not having suc-ceeded in saving that, poor nation. Yee, ceeded in saving that poor sailor. Yes, I will stay here, and work with you. For I perceive that you and I. Peter Ivanovitch, we are not the stuff of heroes, and we are too old to change."

What is a Sardine?

5. Nutritive Value of Sardines

"Skipper," Sardines are rich in the valuable fats which strengthen the body. The salts which they contain promote digestion, and for this reason they are often ordered by dortors.

doctors. If you simply ask for "Sardines" you may get fish that are unpatishing and indigerible. When you insist upon "Skipper" Sardines you get fish that are so nourishing as they are delicious, and as digestible as they are nourishing.

Angus Watson & Co., Proprietors, Newcastle-on-Tyne, England. New Zealand Agent: Mr. Henry Blackman, Box 670, Wellington.

