lege, Christchurch. After spending some time at sea he joined the Bank of New Zealand in Wellington, and in 1912 was transferred to Christchurch. Private Whitcombe came of fighting stock, being descended on his mother's side from Lieutenant-Colonel Mein, C.B., of the 43rd Foot, one of Wellington's officers from Seringapatam to New Orleans, and the occupation of Paris in 1815, and through him from a line of soldiers for generations, so when the call came in August of last year he could not resist, and on the first day on which the lists were opened he enrolled among the first of Can-

A Company of the 1st Canterbury Infantry, and refused to take stripes before leaving with the main body in October last, preferring to earn them by service. He was one of the landing party on Gallipoli on April 25, and having done all the work required of him he went on his last march in the night attack of August 6, and in the great battle for the Ari Burnu heights was killed in action. In Wellington he was a member of the Star Boating Club, and in Christchurch of the Canterbury Rowing Club, but his affection for sailing took him away
