

Mr. R. W. Dalton, British Trade Commissioner for New Zealand, in the course of an interview at Wolverhampton, said that a feature of the New Zealand market was that Americans supplied attractive show-cards with their goods, thus constituting a factor worthy of being taken into serious consideration. By far the greater proportion of the hardware trade in New Zealand was British, yet the goods shown in shop windows were largely American, simply because the articles were more attractive in appearance. The New Zealand market generally had grown very prosperous since the war, and a great increase in the buying power of the country might be expected during the next couple of years.

It is interesting to note to what a considerable degree war work—taken up as a matter of patriotic duty—is providing our young women with careers, says the "Daily Mail." Many of the girls who learnt to drive military motor cars are seeking this sort of employment in civil life. Large numbers of land girls have decided to become small holders, and, very properly, they are to be given equal opportunities with men for taking up land under the Government Settlement Scheme. Women who helped in military canteens have developed a culinary talent for which they are finding lucrative civil employment; others have discovered an organising ability which henceforth will be applied to the control of an important branch of some catering establishment.

HEARNE'S BRONCHITIS CURE
