

FORMS OF MARKETING.

One of the forms in which the consumer buys honey is in various-sized tins. This is a cheap way of putting up the crop, as tins are not nearly so costly as glass jars, and stand more handling. The demand is greatest for the 2 lb. size. When catering for the fancy trade 1 lb. and 2 lb. glass jars are used. The screw-top kind is preferable. No other methods of marketing honey show the produce off to better advantage.

Compressed-paper-pulp pots, the shape of a tumbler, are attracting more attention now than formerly. They are very clean in appearance, and look especially attractive when the printing is neatly done on the outside. The pots have a white paraffined inside surface, and are less costly than glass or tinware. Still another method, and a very good one, is that of preparing honey in Aikin honey-bags. These are of tough paper coated with paraffin. The honey is poured into them, and allowed to stand until granulation has taken place.

PAT-HONEY BOXES.

The honey is run into these boxes just before granulation. The box is then divided off into compartments with sheets of tin. The blocks from the compartments are just the right size for recutting into pats. The honey is allowed to granulate hard. The boxes are then un-
