FINGER-PRINTS.

THE following report of the case Rex v. Blacker, heard before the Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Cohen, and Mr. Justice Gordon, at Sydney, is taken from the Sydney Morning Herald of the 17th May last, and is published for general information.

REX v. BLACKER.

Mr. Betts, instructed by Messrs. Gale and Paine, of Moss Vale, appeared for the prisoner, Robert Stephen Blacker, in support of the appeal against the conviction. Mr. Whitfeld, instructed by the Crown Solicitor (Mr. J. V. Tillett), appeared in support of the conviction. The case stated by Mr. Justice Pring for the determination of the Court set out the following facts: At the last Goulburn Circuit Court prisoner was convicted before him on a charge of wounding Ah Fung with intent to murder. Ah Fung was a Chinese gardener in the employ of Chung Jang, who owned a garden near Mittagong. On the morning of 4th February last Ah Fung, while at work in the garden, was struck on the head and very severely wounded. Afterwards the hut of the Chinese in the garden was ransacked, and some money was stolen. A box belonging to Chung Jang was broken open and the contents were scattered over the floor. On this box was found the imprint of a man's thumb. In order to connect the prisoner with the crime the Crown Prosecutor proposed to show that this imprint and that of the prisoner's thumb were identical with one another. For this purpose Sub-inspector Childs, the officer in charge of the Finger-print Department, was called, and produced enlargements of the photograph of prisoner's left thumb and of the print of the thumb on the box, and these were admitted and marked as Exhibits "H" and "I" respectively. Witness also gave evidence, and said he found fourteen points of identity between the photographs and the thumb-imprint on the box. Mr. Betts objected to "H" and "I" being admitted in evidence, and before sentence was pronounced he asked his Honour to reserve the point that he was in error in admitting "H" and "I" in evidence. The question was whether his Honour was right in admitting the evidence.

Mr. Betts submitted that his Honour was in error in admitting the two photographs in evidence, on the ground that they were secondary evidence, and the jury were not entitled to look at them, as the original prints were before the Court—that was to say, the box upon which there was the imprint of a man's thumb and the photograph taken by Sub-inspector Childs. One photograph which was objected to was an enlargement of the print on the box, and the other was an enlargement of the photograph taken at the police office. He contended that the learned Judge should not have admitted them. The only things the jury should have been allowed to look at were the imprint on the box and the original photographs of the imprint. Then, on the second point, if the enlarged photographs were admissible at all, they could only be admissible as copies of the whole of the original photograph and imprint on the box, and not a portion of each, and they were not complete. This was a case in which no authority could be cited, as the point was a novel one, and must, therefore, be determined on first principles as to the admissibility of evidence and the value of expert evidence. Mr. Justice Pring pointed out that science was only in its infancy, and might be on the wrong track in this matter.

Mr. Justice Cohen: I do not think it is altogether on the wrong track.

Mr. Whitfeld replied on behalf of the Crown, and submitted that the evidence was recognised by law, and was put in in order to enable the experts to illustrate their evidence and their reasons for arriving at a certain conclusion.

The Chief Justice (Mr. Justice Cohen and Mr. Justice Gordon concurring) said he would first point out that the evidence of the expert who was called, and who deposed to the identity or similarity of the two, was very carefully given and very thoroughly tested. The witness stated the whole steps he took before arriving at a conclusion, and the grounds upon which he arrived at it. Again, the jury were very carefully directed by the presiding Judge as to the risk of error to which such evidence was open; and, as far as the conduct of the trial was concerned, every precaution was taken to guard against any wrong conclusion by the jury. In considering the objection to the reception of the evidence, the Court must look very closely at the contention which was based upon the law as to secondary evidence. In one sense any evidence about finger-prints was in itself secondary evidence, but the evidence was given to enable the jury to form an opinion as to the presence or absence of the prisoner from the scene of the outrage at the time it was committed. The principle upon which this class of evidence became material at all was simply this, that a person who had been present at the scene of an outrage had left a picture of part of his body at the place, and that if that picture was compared with another picture of the same part of the body of the prisoner, and they closely corresponded with each other, the evidence would throw some light upon the question of the prisoner's guilt. Here the evidence went strongly to show that the photograph presented points of similarity with the imprint on the box in several important respects, and more especially in regard to the bulbous part of the thumb, and therefore the evidence was material, as identifying one with the other; and the opinion of those who studied this branch of investigation was that it was a very reliable one for the purpose of proving identity. As to this, the expert evidence was sufficiently strong to justify his Honour in receiving the evidence. He thought, therefore, that the first ground of objection failed. Another ground taken was that Exhibit "H," which represented the thumb-print on the box, was not sufficiently complete to justify its admission in evidence. Well, the evidence, which was very strongly tested by cross-examination, was that that part of the prisoner's thumb corresponded closely with the impression on the box. So far as the marks surrounding the impression shown in the exhibit before the Court were concerned, they were not marks which in the opinion of the expert were characteristic parts, and that the whole of the impression of the finger-mark which was material for purposes of comparison, and upon which he arrived at a conclusion, was shown in the photographic enlargement. The Court thought, therefore, that, in the circumstances, it was impossible for his Honour to reject the evidence, and the appeal consequently failed.

Appeal dismissed, and conviction sustained.
