This nearly cosmopolitan species, the common "bed-bug", is introduced, being, according to Myers (1926), "quite unknown to the Maori people before the advent of Europeans". The literature dealing with this species is of course enormous, and references have been restricted to basic taxonomic works, those dealing with New Zealand occurrences, and some of the more important anatomical and biological papers. Further references are given in Van Duzee (1917) and in later works listed, and in such abstracting journals as The Review of Applied Entomology (Ser. B).
