Everyman's Hut

"Sitting on the hillside as the shadows fall,
Christ our Lord and Saviour, pleading there for all;
His heart with grief is stricken,
His eyes with tears o'erflow,
Because His loved Jerusalem has failed His love to know.
O glory, what a Saviour, to bleed and die for me,
O Hallelujah! He has bought redemption full and free,
Upon the Cross of Calvary He hangs,
O hear His plea,
'Come unto Me, O wandering one, I suffered all for thee.'"

Surely, no happier scene of peace and contentment could be found than met the eye of the traveller, who from the slopes of a nearby hill, looked down upon the ancient city of Jerusalem. Bathed in the golden light of the sinking sun, the shadows of domes and towers slowly lengthened. In the court of the Temple—the House of God—preparations were going on for the offering of the evening sacrifice—the visible symbol of the praise and worship to God of His earthly people—the earnest of the One who would come to be their Redeemer.

But no reflection of peace and contentment could be found on the face of that one who looked down upon the city,—instead was a look of yearning pity and compassion, as though he could foresee tragedy falling upon this peaceful scene and would fain avert it. And as he looks, his lips move, in speech. Let us draw near and catch the sorrowful words that fall from them.

"Oh Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killeth the prophets and stoneth them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing, and ye would not. Behold your house is left unto you desolate."

Oh! The sadness of it. A people with an outward profession of worship—a strict observance of the letter of God's law, not knowing that the judgment of God was falling upon them because of their hardness of heart and unbelief. The very sacrifices they offered so religiously pointed to the coming of their Messiah, and on the hill, overlooking it all, shut out from their midst and rejected, was their Messiah Himself, pitying, willing, yearning to deliver them from the wrath to come, but not permitted to because they would not.

"He came unto His own and His own received Him not." "Crucify Him, crucify Him," they cried, "His blood be on us and on our children." The choice was made, the die was cast. A cross for Him, and before that generation passed away, the streets of Jerusalem ran with blood—havoc and destruction overwhelmed the proud city. The judgment had fallen.

And at this moment, reader, that some One is looking down in love and pity upon you ready, willing and yearning to save you from the judgment hanging over your head. Can you not hear the loving accents "Come unto Me." May you never know the awful remorse of standing before the One whom you have rejected and too late hear His words in judgment, "I suffered all for you! How often have I pleaded with you, how often have you heard my voice calling you, but ye WOULD NOT.

"Depart from me. . . ."

Some men thirst after fame, some after love, and some after money.
I know something they all thirst after.
What's that?
Salted almonds.
